STATEMENT

Our ship was flying Number 4 position, and I was at the left waist position when we encountered severe weather about 20 or 25 minutes out from the Italian coast. The weather that we penetrated at first was not so severe as to cause the formation to break up. A few minutes later, the weather became very bad, and the ships in the formation spread out somewhat to avoid a collision. At this moment, I chanced to be looking from the left waist window, and note that ship #65 which Lt. Connors was flying, to go into a very steep glide. I watched the ship until it disappeared into the weather. That was the last time I saw ship #65.

On Saturday, March 31, 1945, while on an operational mission, ship #65 was observed going down. About 1020 hours on the above date, our group encountered bad weather at an altitude of about 7,000 feet. Seven ships in our flight went into a cloud bank and about 20 to 30 seconds later only two ships of the seven ship flight were still in formation. Lt. Connor in ship #65 did not rejoin the formation then or any other time that day. We were over the Adriatic Sea, at the time, and, as near as I can determine, we were at the Key Point, which position was approximately forty miles off the Italian coast near Rimmi. The coordinates were: 44°10'N 15°20'E.

/s/ George W. Dace, Jr.
F/O, AC.

Lt. Connor's ship caught prop wash from the ships in two position, and apparently he lost control of the plane, for it went into a very steep bank through the formation and was going down quite fast with his left wing low when he went into the clouds.
